Warning: Do NOT bank in these "cheques" you get from the banks!

Description

Because we all need Public Service Announcements to save us from banking in money that isn't ours.

There's a marketing tactic being practised by the various banks in Singapore which I'm going to call out today as being extremely unethical and misleading, but hey that's just my personal opinion and you're free to disagree.

If these banks haven't yet gotten a warning by MAS for their tactics, then my guess is that either MAS is completely unaware, or have chosen to close an eye to this. Whatever it is, I believe this is an issue that needs more awareness, and if none of local influencers who are always being paid by the banks / credit card companies to promote their products / services will do it, then I will.

(Don't be quick to blame the influencers. Many of them rely on such sponsored postings for a living, and my guess is that many are afraid to talk bad or expose questionable concerns about the brands they work with in case it affects their future chances of being sponsored. That, is exactly what happened to me after I exposed the misleading marketing messages put out by the influencers engaged for the UOB Krisflyer campaign here. But credibility will always be fundamental to SG Budget Babe, and I'll continue writing, sponsored posts or not.)

So I've been receiving some highly questionable "cheques" from Citibank and Standard Chartered because I'm a banking customer with them. It caught me by surprise the first time I saw it, as I thought they had mistakenly sent me a cheque for something which I wasn't aware of. Upon a closer look, however, I realised it was simply a marketing ploy to get me to take up a loan with them, so into the bin these letters went.

According to others online, it seems like UOB is also practising such a tactic. If you know of more banks doing this, please let me know and I'll add it to the list.

This tactic involves :

- Sending out a "cheque" that actually looks pretty legitimate, with a sum of money printed on it which you can actually cash in
- Accompanying letter states that it'll be credited into your bank account when cleared successfully
- It is even signed off by a prominent figure (in this case, the Head of Retail Banking) to lend some credibility

	Standard S
1) Density (1) In the left of th	ta de trans ensans bry the stransminus text parts text parts t	Follow 19 hrs • I have received quite a number of such "cheques from Standard Chartered and think it's quite unethical to send actual cashable cheques. Just thinking if this was sent to my parents who can't really read English that well, they would have probably cashed in the cheque thinking it was fre money and be subjected to all the loan fees. I may be overthinking but what do y'all think?
Provide Transition account only an employ sector has program has been manual. Provide any program in respect of your citized part sectored on any other analytications in	Here for good	🖒 Like 💭 Comment 🏟 Share
Get		0.9.8
extra	55 3,500.00	View 24 more comments
cash today Los permit in damay 204	- Ohr-	Citibank as well
LOCIETY A MAJIO	Automatives

Reproduced with permission from owner.

01 I'm not sure how many folks would be savvy or alert enough to realise that this money is NOT theirs. Yes, the money does appear in your bank account if you credit it in, but at the same time, you get deducted the sum from your credit card bill. And if you go trigger happy and spend that money, thinking you just got a windfall?

Congrats, you'll have to now deal with a 2.5% processing fee of the sum you just banked in, on top of late payment charges AND interest payment if you fail to clear off the debt within the month.

Clearly I'm not the only one who's annoyed by such unethical marketing tactics. It belongs in the same category as the misleading marketing messages promoted by local Instagram influencers which I've called out previously here (UOB Krisflyer) and here (UOB Stash).

Is this unethical or completely acceptable? You decide.

If your parents are not completely English-literate, you might want to start reading their letters from the banks and credit card companies for as long as such unethical marketing practices (in my opinion) prevails.

With love, Dawn Category

1. Savings